As the earth's natural resources are rapidly dwindling and our environment is being increasingly degraded by human activities, it is evident that something needs to be done. We often feel that managing all these is something that the government should do. But if we continue to endanger our environment, there is no way by which the government can perform all these clean-up functions. Just as for any disease, prevention is better than cure, protecting our environment is economically more viable than cleaning it up once it is damaged. Individually, we can play a major role in environment management. We can reduce wastage of natural resources and we can act as watchdogs that inform the government about sources that lead to pollution and degradation of the environment. This can be made possible through public awareness. Mass media such as newspapers, television and internet can strongly influence public opinion and every individual is responsible for spreading this message to as many people as possible. (162 words)
